☞ While in the latter part of mammals are strictly viviparous, one of the two grand divisions consists of semi-viviparous species, like the opossum and kangaroo, which produce their young while still in an embryonic condition. The former are placental mammals, and the latter non-placental. The following are the principal subdivisions of mammals:—

I. ARCHONES. This include man alone, distinguished from other mammals not only by his spiritual nature, but also structurally in the extreme degree to which the system is made subservient directly to the purposes of the head, the fore limbs being removed from the locomotive series, their position in all other mammals to the cephalic series, the whole body being, thereby, made a part of the head-extremity.

II. MECASTHINES. These have fundamentally a large bite system, and include the larger and more powerful mammals, the maximum of which is literally about four times that of the macrotheres. The orders are as follows:—1. Quadrumanes. These have the four limbs terminating, in more or less perfect hands, as the monkeys. 2. Carnivores. These have the four limbs furnished with stout claws, and feed on flesh, as the lion, dog, bear, seal. Herbivores, or Ungulates. These have the four limbs furnished with hoofs, and have ruminating teeth, as the elephant, horse, ox, deer, tapir. 4. Mutilates. These have two or four limbs, like appendages in place of feet, and are aquatic in life, as the whale, dolphin, and other cetaceans, and the lamantin and dugong.

III. MICROSTHENES. These have fundamentally a small bite system, and include the small mammals. The orders which follow constitute a series in exact parallelism with that of the mecasthenes, the chiropters or bats, being closely related to the quadrumanes (the two groups following one another in converse series), and similarly the insectivores being analogous of the carnivores, the rodents of the herbivores, and the edentates of the mutilates. 1. Chiropters, or bats. These have pectoral mammæ, and the fore limbs extend to form a wing. 2. Insectivores. These have the body covered with hair, the legs short, the feet furnished with claws, and the teeth partly tuberculated, as the moles, shrews, hedge-hogs. 3. Rodents. These have the body covered with hair, and the legs short, and are furnished with at least two incisor teeth in each jaw, which are rootless and constantly growing, as the mouse, squirrel, porcupine. 4. Edentates, or Brutes. These have the body covered either with hair or with bony scales or plates (in the last, as in some other characteristics, approaching reptiles), are furnished with long claws, and are without incisor teeth, as the sloth, armadillo ant-eater

IV Ornithodelphia, or semi-oviparous mammals Of these the larger part are marsupials, or have a pouch for carrying their immature young, as the opossum and kangaroo A few fall of the pouch, though having the supporting marsupial bones, as the ornithorhynchus, and other monotremes Dana

[Gr μετα τὰ φυσικα, after those things which relate to external nature, after physics from μετα, beyond, after, and φυσικος, relating to external nature, natural, physical, from φυσις, nature N Lat metaphysica, Fr metaphysique, It & Sp metafisica It is said that this name was given to the science by Aristotle or his followers, who considered the science of natural bodies, physics, to be the first in the order of studies, and the science of mind, or intelligence, to be the second] [See Note under MATHEMATICS]

1 The science of real as distinguished from phenomenal being, ontology also, the science of being, as such, is distinguished from the science of determined or concrete being the science of the conceptions and relations which are necessarily implied to be true of every kind of being, philosophy in general, first principles, or the science of first principles

☞ Metaphysics is distinguished as general and special General metaphysics is the science of all being as being. Special metaphysics is the science of one kind of being, as, the metaphysics of chemistry or morals, or of politics According to Kant, a systematic exposition of those notions and truths the knowledge of which is altogether independent of experience, would constitute the science of metaphysics

[This] is commonly in the schools called metaphysics, as being part of the philosophy of Aristotle which hath that for title but it is in another sense for there it signifieth as much as books written or placed after his natural philosophy But the schoolmen call them for books of supernatural philosophy; for the word metaphysic will bear both these senses Hobbes

Now the science conversant about all such inferences of unknown being from its known manifestations, is called ontology, or metaphysics proper Sir W Hamilton

Metaphysics are [is] the science which determines what can and what can not be known of being, and the laws of being, a priori Coleridge

2 Hence, in popular language, the scientific knowledge of mental phenomena, mental philosophy, psychology

Metaphysics, in whatever latitude the term be taken, is a science or complement of sciences exclusively occupied with mind Sir W Hamilton

Whether after all,
A larger metaphysics might not help

I ORDINARY MOLLUSKS having a cephalic and caudal extremity or the bipolarity characteristic of animal life, and, accordingly, with some exceptions among the lowest species progressive locomotion In the bivalve species, or conchifers the mouth is opposite one extremity of the shell (a figs 5 and 6) 1 Cephalopods, having a distinct head with perfect eyes and a circle of arms around the mouth, some or all of which are adapted for clinging, as in the cuttle-fish or sepia, the squid (fig 1), and nautilus (fig 9) 2 Cephalates, having a distinct head with eyes and antennæ This class includes (1) the Gasteropods, which move by crawling on a broad expansion below, as in the snail (fig 7) and volute, and (2) the Pteropods, which have wing-like expansions for swimming (fig 8) 3 Acephals, having no distinct projecting head or antennæ and imperfect eyes, when any, as in the oyster (fig 6), clam, and all ordinary bivalves (fig 5) The hinge of the shell is dorsal, and one extremity, usually the shorter (a) is the anterior, and the other (b) the posterior This class includes the Conchifers or Bivalves, also called Lamellibranchs from the lamellar branchiæ, or gills

II ANTHOID MOLLUSKS, having some similarity in form to a flower, especially a bilabiate or orchis-like flower, and, for the most part, attached, at least when young, by a stem or pedicel The bivalve species (or Brachiopods) have the stem proceeding from the beak, and the mouth is opposite, and a line between the two divides the shell and its animal into two symmetrical halves In fig 3 (a, Lingula), a b is the shell opening upward, b c the stem, in fig 2 (the shell of a Terebratula) at b is the aperture for the stem, and the mouth is opposite, a The Ascidians when compound, are attached in a corresponding manner The Bryozoans are always attached and are in general more like regular flowers 1 Ascidians, having a sac like shape, and a leathery or membranous exterior, with two openings, one for the entrance and the other for the exit of water as the ordinary Ascidia and Salpæ 2 Brachiopods having a bivalve shell and a pair of spiral fringed appendages, called arms, situated one either side of the mouth as the Lingula (fig 3), Terebratula (fig 2) 3 Bryozoans minute animals, having a circle of slender arms around the mouth (n, 4 showing the head of the animal exsert from its cell) and making delicate corals, sometimes moss-like, as the Reteporæ and Flustra Dana

☞ Notwithstanding is, by Johnson and Webster viewed as a participle absolute Its several meanings, either as preposition adverb, and conjunction, are capable of being explained in this view Johnson says "This word, though in conformity to other writers called here a conjunction, is properly a participial adjective as it is compounded of not and withstanding and answers to the Latin non obstante, it is most properly and analogically used in the ablative case absolute with a noun, as, he is rich, notwithstanding his loss Dr Webster says it is the participle of withstand with not prefixed, and signifying not opposing, nevertheless It contains in all cases, its participial signification For example it is a rainy day but notwithstanding that, the troops must be reviewed, that is, the rainy day not opposing or preventing That in this case, is a substitute for the whole first clause of the sentence It is to that clause what a relative is to an antecedent noun and which may be used in the place of it notwithstanding which, that is, the rainy day' Later grammarians while admitting that the word was originally a participle, and can be treated as such, prefer to class it as a preposition or disjunctive conjunction

O.

O, the fifteenth letter, and the fourth vowel, in the English alphabet, has several different sounds, the principal of which are, the long sound, heard in tone, groan, old; the short sound, heard in lot, lodge, rod; a sound like short u, as in done, son, flood; a sound like the German or Italian long u, or the French ou, as in move, do, booty; a similar but shorter sound, as in wolf, book, foot; and a sound like broad a, as in form, mortal. See Principles of Pronunciation, §§ 19–25, 50, 51. In Irish family names, O is equivalent to son of, and denotes progeny, or is a character of dignity, as, O'Neil, O'Carrol. Among the ancients, O was a mark of triple time, from the notion that the ternary, or number 3, is the most perfect of numbers, and properly expressed by a circle, the most perfect figure.

O, interj. An exclamation used in calling or directly addressing a person or personified object, — used also as an impassioned exclamation expressing pain, grief, surprise, desire, and the like.

> For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven. Ps. cix. 89
> O, how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day. Ps. cxix. 97
> O fairest of creation, last and best
> Of all God's works. Milton.

☞ A distinction between the use of O and oh is insisted upon by some, namely, that O should be used only in direct address to a person or personified object, and should never be followed by the exclamation point, while oh should be used in mere exclamations where no direct appeal or address to an object is made and may be followed by the exclamation point or not, according to the nature or construction of the sentence. This distinction, however, is nearly or totally disregarded by most writers, even the best, the two forms being generally used quite indiscriminately. The form O is the one most commonly employed for both uses by modern writers. "O for a kindling touch from that pure flame!" Wordsworth. "O, what a rapturous cry!" "O' Lidon, in whatever sphere thou shine!" "Strike, oh Muse, in a measure bold." Macaulay. "O, what a fair and ministering angel!" "O sweet angel." Longfellow.

> For you the public prayer is made,
> Oh! join the public prayer!
> For you the secret tear is shed,
> O, shed yourselves a tear. Cowper.
> O sir, oh prince, I have no country none. Tennyson.
> O dear, and O dear me! [corrupted from It. O Dio! or It. O Dio! O God! and It. O Dio mio! O my God!] Wyman], exclamations expressive of various emotions, but usually prompted by surprise, consternation, fear, grief, pain, and the like. "O dear me!" remonstrated Sir Leicester, not so much shocked by the fact, as by the fact of the fact being mentioned. Dickens.

2 That to which the desire is directed, that on which the purposes are fixed as the end of action or effort, that which is sought for, end, aim, motive, final cause

Ob jĕct'ive, a. [Fr objectif, Sp objetivo, It. obbiettivo]

1. Pertaining or relating to an object

2 (Metaph) Pertaining to, contained in, or being in the nature or position of, the object, outward, external, extrinsic, — an epithet applied to what exists exterior to the mind, or which is the object of thought or feeling, and opposed to subjective. See SUBJECTIVE

Objective means that which belongs to, or proceeds from, the object known, and not from the subject knowing, and thus denotes what is real, in opposition to that which is ideal — what exists in nature in contrast to what exists merely in the thought of the individual Sir W Hamilton

☞ In the middle ages, subject meant substance, and has this sense in Descartes and Spinoza, sometimes, also, in Reid. Subjective is used by Will Occam to denote that which exists independent of mind, objective, what is formed by the mind. This shows what is meant by realitas objectiva in Descartes. Kant and Fichte have inverted the meanings. Subject is the mind which knows, object, that which is known, subjective, the varying conditions of the knowing mind, objective, that which is in the constant nature of the thing known Trendelenburg

3 (Gram) Pertaining to, or designating, the case which follows a transitive verb or a preposition, being that case in which the object of the verb is placed, when denoting what is produced or affected by the act expressed by the verb.

Objective point (Mil), a point to which the operations of an army are directed

Syn — OBJECTIVE, SUBJECTIVE. Objective is applied to things which are exterior to the mind, and objects of its attention, subjective, to the operations of the mind itself. Hence, an objective motive is some outward thing awakening desire, a subjective motive is some internal feeling or propensity. Objective views are those which are governed by outward things, subjective views are produced or modified by internal feeling. Sir Walter Scott's poetry is chiefly objective, that of Wordsworth is eminently subjective.

In the philosophy of mind, subjective denotes what is to be referred to the thinking subject, the ego; objective what belongs to the object of thought, the non ego. Philosophy being the essence of knowledge, and the science of knowledge supposing, in its most fundamental and thorough-going analysis, the distinction of the subject and object of knowledge, it is evident that to philosophy the subject of knowledge would be by pre-eminence the subject, and the object of knowledge the object. It was therefore natural that the object and objective, the subject and subjective, should be employed by philosophers as simple terms, compendiously to denote the grand discrimination about which philosophy was constantly employed, and which no others could be found so precisely and promptly to express Sir W Hamilton.

Ŏx'ide, n. [Fr. oxide, oxyde, Sp. oxido, It. ossido. The French word was correctly spelt with i instead of y in the second syllable, till about the year 1840, when, in ignorance or forgetfulness of the true history and composition of the term, the orthography was changed to make it represent the v of the Greek word ὀξυς, from which it was supposed to be directly derived.] (Chem.) A compound of oxygen and a base destitute of acid and salifying properties.

☞ This word has been variously written oxide, oxyd, oxyde, and oxid. It was introduced into the present system of chemical nomenclature by Guyton de Morveau in 1787, and was by him and his associates of the French Academy spelled oxide, the first syllable of Fr. oxygène, or oxygene, being prefixed to the last syllable of acide, to denote a substance, not acid, formed by the combination of some simple body with oxygen, it not being at that time known that any of the oxides possess acid properties. The same termination, as indicative of combination, is added to the first syllable or syllables of the names of other elements. Thus, from chlorine, sulphur, phosphorus, iodine, carbon, bromine, and nitrogen, we have respectively chloride, sulphide, phosphide, iodide, carbide, bromide, and nitride. These words, and others formed on the same analogy, are often spelled without the final e, and some writers have therefore omitted the e from oxide also, but this form of the word (oxid) is very unusual. From an oversight of the history and true composition of the term, many have been led to write a y instead of i in the last syllable, oxyd or oxyde, as if the y were necessary to represent the v of the Greek ὀξυς, whereas, in the original formation of this word, no immediate reference was had to the Greek, as has already been shown. Besides, it may be observed that the Greek itself has other words, such as ὀξος, ὀξαλεος, ὀξαλις, ὀξίνα, &c., formed from the same root as ὀξύς, but without the v of that adjective, or in which the v is changed into some other vowel. The orthography oxide, or oxid, is, therefore, both historically and etymologically to be preferred, and not only so, but it is better supported by usage than oxyd or oxyde, being the form of spelling adopted by the great majority of chemists and scientific writers both in England and America.

Ŏx'id-ĭz-a-ble, a. Capable of being oxidized.

Ŏx'id-īze, v. t. [imp. & p. p. OXIDIZED, p. pr. & vb. n. OXIDIZING.] To convert into an oxide, to oxidate.
